The Positive & Negative Effects of Technology in Business

-Dr. Jayashree R. Kotnal

Business systems have reached the point where it's difficult to imagine operating even a small company without basic technology such as desktop computers to receive email and keep records. For the most part, technological innovations speed up workflow and provide indispensable systems for organizing information. However, technology can also have negative effects on a business, making communication more impersonal and creating a false sense of knowledge.

Brings People Together, and Tears Them Apart

Technology is a double-edged sword when it comes to bringing people together. On the one hand, it makes it easier for co-workers to communicate and collaborate as they make use of email and team-chat sites such as Slack and Stride. Even basic technologies such as email and text messages speed up response time in emergencies and allow a more leisurely time frame for less urgent issues. However, social media platforms can be distracting, and they can't replace face-to-face interactions when it comes to the truly meaningful actions that build strong and resilient teams. In the Human Resources department, for example, technology can streamline benefit solutions and store and scan applications to efficiently screen prospects, but a computerized application process is rarely an adequate substitute for a face-to-face meeting to determine whether an applicant is a good fit for your company.

Organizes Information, But Needs Familiarity

Computers store and organize information in ways that would often take human beings considerably more time. It takes seconds to pull a profit and loss statement using Quick Books, while it might take hours to compile the same report on paper by hand. The information systems you create using technology and software are only as good as the information you enter into them. There is no substitute for firsthand knowledge of how your business works when setting up a computerized application to track your operations. The person who enters the data must be deeply familiar with the nuances of your company's business model to generate truly meaningful information.

Saves Money, and Costs Money

Technology saves money for your business by saving time, such as the hours that would be required to compile reports by hand. In addition, meaningful and up-to-date information helps you quickly recognize problems and opportunities and respond probatively. However, computers, software and the training required to maintain and upgrade them can be expensive. These expenditures may be more costly than the time you save.

Enhances Customer Data, But Raises Privacy Concerns

The enhanced access to information made possible by computer systems raises a range of privacy issues. By collecting data about customer needs and behavior, companies are able to effectively target advertising and promotions. Many consumers consider this kind of record keeping a violation of their privacy, and it raises a host of legal issues. Similarly, businesses can use technology to monitor employee behavior and performance but this type of surveillance can create a hostile work environment. In addition, businesses can fall victim to unscrupulous individuals who hack into their computer systems and steal valuable proprietary information.

Speeds Things Up, But Destroys Jobs

Manufacturing technologies can introduce efficiencies to a business by speeding up processes that you would otherwise have to complete manually. Assembly lines improve productivity by consolidating processes and moving more quickly than humans can. However, replacing humans with machines can introduce new problems, such as a bakery mixer that mixes quickly and thoroughly but can't make adjustments for idiosyncrasies in batches of flour or the amount of moisture in the air. Large-scale automation also creates social problems by putting people out of their jobs. New technology should be implemented in conjunction with retraining programs to prepare displaced employees for doing other types of work.

Soft Skills technics in Workplace

--- By Dr. R. M. Mirdhe

Think of soft skills as your personal skills. Things you do that make you a great employee outside of the technical skills that are needed for the job. They may come naturally to you or perhaps you've added some classes to your list to augment these abilities. If you haven't, consider working to develop your soft skills in the workplace. Soft skills, which may seem basic to some, are difficult for employers to find, so they're impressed by applicants who can demonstrate a strong set.

There are too many soft skills to list them all, but here are some examples of soft skills that employers most appreciate.

1. Strong work ethic.

This one you probably didn't learn in school. It's either a part of your DNA or your parents taught it to you. These examples of soft skills are seemingly simple things like being punctual, getting things done on time, and understanding that a job might be more than punching in and punching out. Employers struggle to find employees who make work a high priority. It doesn't mean that you have to give up your home life for the sake of work.

How do you show it? Take your career seriously and do what it takes to get the job done. Sometimes that can mean doing jobs that seem beneath your experience. If you can display examples of a great work ethic in your resume, cover letter, or your interview, you have a great start.

2. Communication skills.

This is a broad category. It can mean anything from how you converse with a client to how well you get your point across in inter-office emails. The ability to communicate with clients and team members is essential. It's not just when you are trying to get a point across, either. A good employee is also a good listener. The ability to listen to others and display empathy when necessary is unfortunately hard to find.

How about presenting? Having the soft skills to present to a small or large group can put you ahead of the crowd in a big way.

If you have a chance to take a class on communication skills like those presented by Dale Carnegie Training, it's well worth your time and money. It's one of the most crucial soft skills in any job in any industry. If you already think that it is one of your best attributes, find a way to demonstrate that on your resume and in your interview.

3. Creative problem solving.

The last thing an employer wants is an employee who sees a tough situation and says, "Wow. I don't know what to do here." They want to know that you can think logically and come up with ways to work around problems. The more creative, the better. That kind of thinking leads to innovation and improvements within the company.

On your resume, be sure to list out the situations where you faced adversity and created solutions to the problems. At your interview, express your enthusiasm for tackling challenges. Every job has hurdles and employers want to hire people who aren't afraid of tackling those challenges.

4. Time management.

Do you know how to look at everything that is on your work plate and prioritize your tasks? Time management is more than just working hard and not goofing off. It means making the most of each day and getting the most important things done first. If necessary, the ability to delegate assignments to others when needed is a part of it. It's not impressive to an employer that you work 10 hours each day if you only have 8 hours of work. Learning how to manage your time to create maximum efficiency is a money saver for the company and makes you a hero in their eyes.

To provide examples of skills related to time management, highlight one or two examples in your resume of difficult and time-consuming tasks and demonstrate how you found a way to get it done efficiently.

5. Teamwork.

Teamwork isn't about your part on the intramural soccer team. It means you have the ability to work with others in a professional environment. It can be harder than it seems. For those who believe that they know how to do the job and don't have faith in others to do their part, they can create tension in the office and hurt the overall efficiency. Learning to trust others, work together, give and accept ideas is a difficult skill to master, but if you can, you'll be well ahead of the game.

Show off your examples of soft skills in teamwork by displaying your ability to work with team members in your resume and highlighting it during your interview. Show enthusiasm for accepting coworkers' ideas and maximizing your team's efficiency by using each person's strengths.

6. Leadership.

This could be the most important of the soft skills. Good work ethic, problem solving, time management, communication skills, and teamwork ability are all skills that can make you a great employee. Leadership skills make you a candidate to be more than that. No matter the job, most employers are looking for someone who is capable of growing beyond that job. In fact, leadership skills can really be looked at as a combination of all the other soft skills. When you put them together, you have a person who can not only work well with the team, but take the reins and make the rest of the team better.

If you've been in charge of big projects in the past, bring that out in your resume and in interviews. Show that you're not someone who is just looking to punch in and punch out, but an applicant who is ready to conquer this job and grow into a future leader within the company. That makes you a very attractive investment for the hiring company.

Think of your soft skills as the accessories to your training in your field. They, alone, cannot qualify you for a job, but when paired with solid credentials, they can make you a much more attractive candidate for any job. From cashier, to construction worker, to CEO, soft skills are needed in today's workforce. Learn to cultivate yours and display them for employers to see and you'll keep yourself ahead of the pack.

Students Wisdom

TRENDS THAT WILL CHANGE OUR IDEA OF THE EDUCATION SYSTEM

- By Ms. Soumya. Kosti, Dr. J R Kotnal

Below we discuss global trends associated with information technology's influence on how we study.

According to the report issued by the New Media Consortium and the Association of Information Technology Professionals, within the next five years the education system will be determined by the following trends:

Changes in the culture of innovation

The world is changing, and education must change along with it. Educational institutions adopt ideas from the world of business, referring to successful start-up experiences, and launch new processes.

Paper routine is gradually leaving schools, ceding its place to electronic data processing. Higher education institutions have realized that technologies can become a catalyst of educational process improvement. Yet, the culture of innovation means not only acceptance of new technologies and revision of teaching methods, it also signifies awareness of the fact that values in the external world constantly change. This means education must change as well in order to meet student expectations.

Expansion of cooperation between organizations

The number of contacts and connections between various organizations in education is growing, and technologies influence this trend in two ways. First of all, it becomes impossible not to use technologies, while the use of them is often too expensive. Therefore educational institutions open a dialogue with each other and with educational technology makers, so as to agree on advantageous terms and conditions and to influence final products. Secondly, schools and universities are beginning to share data and content more actively. Lesson notes, methodical guidelines, and class records are uploaded to the network. This is beneficial for everyone: both instructors and students. Various school blogging platforms are developed, uniting educational institutions in social media and allowing rapid exchanges of professional experiences.

Changes in the role of student assessment

Technologies make it possible to work with large data sets, e.g. to record statistics of student results and conclude which teaching methods are better. It is possible to maintain a detailed database on each student from his/her entrance to a secondary school until his/her graduation from a university in order to adjust his/her individual learning plan and draw conclusions on the education system on the whole. This shifts focus from final assessment to intermediate results that prove to be much more important for development of an education strategy. Given that the said data are accessible not only to teachers, but to students as well, students gain more independence and control of their opportunities.

Spread of open educational resources

Many teachers are sincerely happy to share their knowledge with the entire world, not thinking of any personal benefit. Otherwise it would be difficult to explain such a rapid dissemination of free educational materials on the Internet: courses, workbooks, learning content, research articles, and many more.

Spread of blended learning

Owing to the information technology, a flipped classroom model has started spreading, and various forms of blended learning have emerged. Blended learning combines the best of both worlds: an opportunity to distribute time and effort freely and to acquire knowledge limitlessly beyond the classroom, as well as advantages of working with the teacher face to face. The modern trend is that more and more educational institutions count on an effective combination of technologies and traditional personal tutorship.

Rearrangement of learning spaces

Educational institutions have started changing spaces so that students can work with electronic devices and interact more with each other. One of such rearrangement options is to place a teacher in the classroom centre with student workplaces located around the teacher, with information that would have previously been shown on a blackboard displayed on everyone's personal screens. Libraries and other spaces in educational institutions are creating individual learning places where it is convenient to work on one's portable devices.
